Understand Your Garden's Style

There are points that have to be taken into consideration before one gets to choose on any form of garden sculptures & existing garden decor. Each garden is unique and reflects the character of its owner, and the location, plants it provides and the style of the layout. A garden of a contemporary house with clean aesthetical design might require the presence of abstract sculptures that represent the same spirit. On the other hand, if one has a cottage or country style garden then the garden ornaments may include animals, gnomes, or traditional statues which are more of style classic.

It will help if you establish the theme of your garden to avoid buying sculptures that will produce a contrast that is undesirable on your plants. For example, the wildlife representation might be complemented with large forms and free lines if a nature garden is being designed, if it is a small paved yard in a civilization, then it is better to complement it with small forms and strict geometric forms.

Determine the Placement and Size

The next critical aspect about gardens is placement and once you have looked at your garden you will want to input its style. There are various types of garden sculptures and these are mostly large and should best be installed in places where it will not overpower the garden. First, decide upon the vistas in your garden: they are the spots where the attention is intended to be attracted: near a path, in the center of a flower bed, close to a bench.

Size also has a vital role, for it determines the degree of control when it comes to parties. Garden sculptures on a very large scale works very well and gives out a very strong feel but around them must have space to give them some breathing space. They should be placed in places where they could be seen from a distance so that the driver will not be tempted to reverse. As for the smaller sculptures, these will look well being placed in the corners of a room or even placed among plants.

Choose the Right Material

Garden sculptures can be made out of stone, metal, wood or resin among other materials. So while choosing outdoor garden sculptures which are best suited to your garden, one must make sure that the type of material used appeals to your garden's natural environment and the climatic conditions within which you live.

When it comes to a more enhanced type of sculpture, metal sculptures are preferred because of their lengthy span and the fact that they do not erode easily especially when exposed to unfavorable weather conditions. There are numerous outlets of metal sculptures, such as Cast & Bloom Metalworks; these come with durable features to match the artistic designs as well. Many of these pieces are modern but there is always the option to get the more traditional metal sculpture, and these sculptures bring the feeling of permanency to the garden.

It is quite similar to wood but is more traditional or could be termed as classic for the garden. Yet, stone sculptures are complex and rather cumbersome since they are rather massive, which might be a problem in terms of the location. Here we have selected several resin sculptures, which can adorn any garden style as they are rather lightweight and are not affected by weather conditions.

When installed around seating areas or along paths they offer cooling in hot months and complements the other senses of one's garden. If used alongside the correct garden sculptures they can complement one another in bringing out a good balance of art and plants.

Consider the Functionality of the Sculpture

Although most of the outdoor garden sculptures are ornamental they are sometimes commissioned to serve specific functions. For instance, you may select a sculpture that acts as a birdbath as well as a sculpture at the entrance of the garden that is equipped with lights to light up a garden path. This makes your space have an extra feature of both interest and functionality in equal measure.

For instance, most of the contemporary garden sculptures have incorporated solar lights that are functional for lighting the garden and at the same time a great piece of artwork instead of being purely functional. This is a very efficient way of giving garden sculptures more functionality particularly in areas where the space is limited.
